RESULT OF A SPREE.

Hotel Guest Becomes Violent and Has to Be Removed. About 11 o'clock last night a tall, grayhaired, smooth-faced man, about fifty or fifty-five years of age, engaged a room at the St. James Hotel, registering as John Colgan of Wabasha, Minn. This morning he appeared to be recovering from the effects of a prolonged spree, and created no little disturbance at the hotel by his ravings and profane language. Detectives Weedon and Lacey were sent for, and they took the man to police headquarters, not, however, before he had struck Detective Lacey a smart blow in the face. He accompanied the blow with the explanation that it was a way he had of showing affection. When police headquarters was reached he became suddenly sick. He was made as comfortable as possible on the floor, and lay there perfectly still until he observed an idle throng of curious people gazing at him through the open doors.

"Here," he explained, springing to his feet, "this ain't right. I object. If that gang wants to look at me shut the door and charge them 25 cents admission. I'm willing to make a show of myself if I get paid for it." Then he tore off his coat and wanted to fight, clearly demonstrating that whatever else he might be he was not a pugilist. He was taken back to the office of Sanitary Officer Frank, who directed that he be taken to the sixth precinct and given med-The Golden Cross.
